Journey VS Destination

On why the map is not the point

Most people arrive at coaching with a destination in mind. A title, a number, a version of themselves photographed from a flattering angle. The destination is not the problem; treating it as the work is.

A destination tells you nothing about Tuesday. It cannot be practised. It has no texture, no failure mode, and no way of telling you whether today counted.

What can be practised is a journey: the specific repeated things that make the destination probable, and that are worth doing whether or not it arrives.

This is not a case against ambition. It is a case against ambition without a Tuesday, which is how most ambition quietly expires.
